FRENCH LUNNING

A Personal Reminiscence on the History of the MFA Program at the Minneapolis College of Art and Design

As Marshall McLuhan so beautifully and accurately described it: "History writing is ever tied to the fragment. The known facts are often scattered broadcast, like stars across the firmament. It should not be assumed that they form a coherent body in the historical night." This is to say, that this "history" of the MFA graduate program at the Minneapolis College of Art and Design I have been asked to write, are mere fragments of memories that I never took into account as any sort of "history." Instead, they were the many events that formed around me, involved me, challenged me, puzzled me, amused me, and ultimately made me an enthusiastic advocate of the program. You will note that I do not include dates here, as time in memory for me is rarely cataloged in analytical data – but more likely in terms of the rock music that was popular at the time, the progress of relationships, and the emotions of key events. Nevertheless, this is how I remember it all (with a bit of help from Rik And Tom) – as fragments in the MCADian historical night.

I was there in the very beginning; then president John Skorp had apparently decided that we needed an MFA degree as part of the MCAD academic program. Lucky for all of us, he asked the then Chair of Media

While in the MCAD MFA program, I made a series of large-scale paintings that occupied entire galleries and were shown leaning against walls to activate the critique spaces. These were my first forays into using materials and techniques such as acrylic transfers, stencils, and inviting chance into my painting process.

Circles in Blue #1 is a recent painting which is part of a larger series I call Unusual Landscapes. I form patterns of geometric shapes within fields of organic, and somewhat randomly applied forms and textures, to abstractly represent elements such as the sky or the surface of water.
